The Story Behind Messy Church

A few years ago an ordinary, smallish Anglican church in Hampshire, England, decided to do something to give local families more opportunities to come to church together and stay in church together. The traditional services were fine for established Christians but weren't attracting new people to church, so we had to ask around humbly to find out what families would actually like to do in church together. We had to look honestly at the gifts and limitations of our church members, and we had to ask and keep on asking God what was the wise way forward. Out of this inadequate and fairly made-up-on-the-spot listening process, Messy Church began in 2004, and, through the energy of an unsleeping God, has been growing ever since.

The strength of Messy Church lies in its simplicity and the robust set of values that underpin it. It's a simple format that usually consists of a warm welcome, an hour of hands-on activities around a Bible theme, a short gathered celebration (worship time), and a meal around tables. It's easy to see how the gradual building of community happens through this shape. But the shape is undergirded, more importantly, by five values: being Christ-centered and using every moment to invite people to come closer to Jesus; being hospitable, with the challenge of being God's guests and welcoming hosts; allowing space for creativity, for the God-spark in each of us to come to life as we get our hands into the stuff of the earth and play together; celebrating and expressing the joy of the life-giving love of Jesus; and being intergenerational, a community where the old feel as treasured as the young, where the children and teenagers feel as valued as the adults. Recent research on both sides of the Atlantic shows that the best way for faith to "stick" into adult life is by bringing up children in a church where all the generations worship together.

I would also argue that Messy Church's success lies in the way it is led by such ordinary, extraordinary people: people who have no accreditation or licensing within the different denominations but who are amateurs in the best sense of the word — doing what they do for love. People who have been ministered to in churches for years and who now want to minister to others and share God's love and message of life with the families in their community. People who understand that many of us grow in Christ as gently as a child grows up within a family, and that a local church can provide that transformative space where young and old can grow together in Christ.

This simple, robust framework has led many churches to start their own Messy Church, and, with the sacrificial support given by its home organization, the Bible Reading Fellowship (brf.org.uk), the network continues to grow. There are Messy Churches in all the mainstream United Kingdom denominations (and quite a few of the smaller ones) and in more than thirty countries around the world. In churches large and small, rural and urban, high and low and middle of the road, Christians are discovering for themselves what it means to become an outward-facing, mission-minded, Christ-centered church, and God is blessing that willingness to serve him by sending hundreds of thousands of new people through the doors of churches to encounter his loving welcome and life-giving community there. A rough estimate gives the number as 500,000 people attending Messy Church each month, of which probably around 200,000 are new to church.

As Messy Church grows in the United States, we warmly encourage you to see what God is already doing and join in. Become part of this generous, loving family that shares ideas, support, and resources around the globe. Take the five values seriously but have fun reinterpreting the shape for the families in your own context. Be bold, but be connected and remember that in our mobile world you may well have families moving into your community who have experienced Messy Church in their previous home, so let the "brand" keep its integrity too.

God has been so generous to us. Messy Church is one way in which we can share that abundant generosity with families and others who never before have had the chance to experience the love of God and of his people. Who knows what changes in society this will lead to? Let's change the world together by getting messy – one painty finger at a time.
